IRMC Physician Group Receives Four-Star Rating

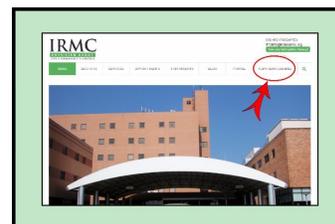

IRMC Physician Group is proud to announce its third consecutive four-star rating by the Center for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

Out of a five stars, IPG averaged a four-star rating and will continue providing the highest patient-care quality to Indiana and the surrounding areas.

CMS offers an online tool called "Physician Compare," which is a website required by the Affordable Care Act to assist patients choosing a medical provider to receive treatment from. "Physician Compare" is used by patients, insurers, and governments to keep track of physician performance and where physicians can make improvements to increase patient-satisfaction rates.

"Physician Compare" offers provider:

- Names, addresses, and phone numbers
- Gender
- Primary and secondary specialties
- Group practice affiliation
- Clinical training information

Lack of Female Urologists

The amount of female urology patients in the United States is quickly growing, but not enough female urologists are available to treat female patients.

One reason more women are seeing urologists is because of aging women developing incontinence, which is involuntary urine leakage. Urologists treat conditions related to the kidneys, bladder, and urinary tract.

According to a study conducted by Northwestern Medicine, more than half of female urology patients prefer to see a female urologist instead of a male urologist. The study found that the majority of female urology patients feel more comfortable seeking a female urologist for treatment.

In 1989, there were approximately 34 female urologists in the United States. In 2009, the number rose to 512, an increase of more than 1,000 percent.

Today, out of 9,600 urologists, female urologists only account for 8 to 12 percent.

A doctor's gender may influence the gender of patients a doctor sees.

The study found that female urologists performed more gender-neutral procedures than male urologists. Around 54 percent of females went to a female urologist and around 32 percent went to

Escaping Emails

Expecting employees to constantly check emails after the workday disrupts a healthy work-family balance, according to researchers.

Bosses who expect employees to always be on call after work typically cause more harm than good to their employees. The anticipation of expecting work emails after the workday concludes creates

Although email adds a tremendous amount of job flexibility, it does not allow employees to properly separate work from personal time.

Post-work emails more negatively affect those who expect to keep work and family activities separate because they feel work is taking too much priority over their family, which can strain personal relationships.

Also, blurring the work-family line does not allow the body to replenish its physical and mental resources, leading to future stress-related complications.

In May 2016, the French government proposed an amendment called the "Disconnection Clause" that limits companies with 50 or more employees to limit the number of emails sent after the workday ends. Companies that violate the amendment could be fined.

Remember, work and personal time need set apart in order to be most effective in the work environment and at home.

If stress seems to be getting the best of you, please set up an appointment with psychiatrists Dr. Joseph
